Active Parenting “The Teen Series”

The conventional wisdom about parenting teenagers seems to be that it is a necessary evil, something to be dreaded, feared and undertaken with all the enthusiasm of a root canal without Novocain. The jokes about parenting teenagers are all negative: “It’s like trying to nail Jell-o to a tree;” “It explains why some animals eat their young;” There’s nothing wrong with teenagers that reasoning with them won’t aggravate.” The statistics on teen drug use, pregnancy, delinquency, and even suicide are enough to give any concerned parent pause for reflection. Although we can never guarantee our children’s success, we want to know in our hearts that we have given them our best efforts. Part of giving our best means tackling the job of parenting teens like we would any other job that is both important and difficult; with training and support. For too long, however, our society has treated parenting as if it was either easy or unimportant, and parents have had to fend for themselves. Without training, families often experience frustration and conflict, and they’re left wondering what went wrong.

Fortunately, there are answers. Parents and parent-education professionals have learned a lot over the years about what works and doesn’t work with teenagers. In this series of trainings Russ will be presenting the latest information available on raising teens and he will give information on many of the issues that can challenge anyone dealing with teens. Come expecting to gain knowledge that will help you feel empowered to have success with teens in your care.
